TOKENS

Each day upon the yellow Nile, 'tis said,
Joseph, the youthful ruler, cast forth wheat,
That haply, floating to his father's feet—
The sad old father, who believed him dead—
It might be sign in Egypt there was bread; It might be sign in Egypt there was bread;
And thus the patriarch, past the desert sands
And scant oasis fringed with thirsty green,
Be hured toward the love that yearned unseen.
Be flung and scattered—ah! by what dear hands!—
On the swift rushing and invisible tide,
Bmall tokens drift adown from far, fair lands;
And say to us, who is the desert bide,
"Are you athirst? Are there no sheaves to bind?
Beloved, here is fullness; follow on and find."

AN APPLE WOMAN'S STORY

Thim's three cints apiece, sur, two fur five cints—Baldwins they are—the pick of the bar'l, an' as sound as ever growed. Thank ye, sir. Am I doing a good business! In gineral, I do—there be hapes of the bar of the control of the co folks comes to these offices, an' they buys liberal, but today it's dirty an' sloppy, an' they're all in a hurry. It's a good stand I have, anny way, God be praised! an' av I wor taken sick I have enough in the bank to nurse an' to bury me daycent, without axin' charity. An' my good luck all kem suddin.

It must be an interestin' story? Well, It must be an interestin story? Well, I dunno; but I don't mind tellin' av you care to listen. You see, Mickey McAvoy an' I had been married six years an' we had but one b'y, but he was a fine one, an' we were doin' well. Mickey was sober an' industrious, an' ambitious of ownin' a farm out in the west, where they do be fivin' 'em away, av you've the manes to tock thim an' git to thim—for he'd been ght up on a big farm on the owld sod beyant. But it wasn't to be.

The b'y he tuk sick wan day wid the dipthery, an' in spite of all the doctor could do—sorra the little they kin do whin er time's come—he died. The heart was ruk o' me, but Mickey tuk it harder, an' that's sayin' a dale, seein' that I was the b'y's mother. The day after the funeral Mickey had to go to work or lose a job, an', whether it was wid the sorrow or that, poor Mickey's fut slipped on the in' him nigh to the top, an' they ought him home dead. We'd saved somethin' betune us—he od and I wid the washin'-but what wid the funeral—an' illigant it was, twelve carriages an' a cashkit, to say nothin' of lashin's of the best at the wake -I had but tin dollars an' some cints left, I cast around to do somethin' to kape life in me, for I was too worn out for washin'. So I got a basket an' I filled to the offices to sell 'em. An' I did well, too. The young clarks'd buy the apples sometimes, an' the janitors an' office b'ys the paynuts, an' I made out to pay the rint of my room an' to get the bite an'

Wan day whin I kem home Mrs. Finwho lived on the flure below an' husband is a brick mason, sez to me, sez she: "Did you hear that noise last night, o' groanin' in the room back o' ye!" "I didn't," sez I, "av it was in the night, for I slape sound." "Well," she sex, "it's the gerril-that runs the sewin' sez, "it's the gerril-that runs the sewin' machine," she sez, "an' she's sick an' I've been there to-day, an' will ye help a little to-night?" she sez, "for I've the baby to mind." "I will," sez I, an' I did. The gerril's name was Cherry Bashford, an' dacent she was, for a lone, dissholute orfian, an' kept herself alone an' meddled an' made wid no wan. The doctor kem, an' she soon got well o' the cold an' the faver, an' she an' I got quite friendly, though she was a lady bred, poor as she was, any one could see that, an' as for beauty, the ladies ye see in them carriages on the strates couldn't hould a candle to her. An' she always called me Mrs. Moer. An' she always called me Mrs. Mc-It was never "Biddy" wid her, sich is not the way to spake to a widdy wid a good character.

We got quite frien'ly, as I said, an' wan day I said to her, sez I, "Miss Bashford, you do be lonely up there in yer room," I sez, "an' what'd all ye about movin' your -there's a dure machine into my room—there's a dure betune us, and ye'd be company," sez I. "But," sez she, "though I'm much obliged to ye, I won't; but we'll kape the dure open in daytime, an' I'll kape an eye on your room whin yer away." So frien'ly did we git, an' she a born lady, as I said before.

Wan day I kem to this very buildin' wid my basket, an' in I goes to wan office an' another, an' in to Mr. Gaskell's, him as owns the buildin'. I was known by the clarks, who always bought from me, an' Master George, the master's only son, though he was a sort of head clark, would b..y like the rest, and he had a great y like the rest, and he had a great bit of jokin' with me. But that day the owld gintlemin happened to hear him in his office, an' he kem out in a high in his office, an' he kem out in a high timper an' sez he to me, "You kape out o' here wid your basket, for you day-moralize the clerks from their business." "As you plaze, sir," sez I, bowld enough, though it was two dollars a week out o' my pocket, an' out I wint. Master George, he was angry, an' gev me a quarter, an' said he'd buy of me whin he had a chance. And I was so flurried wid the cantankerous owld gintleman—but it's the cantankerous owld gintleman-but it's a good man he is, for all that—that I dropped a cross that I keep about me for luck—it kem from Rome an' was blessed by the holy father himself, an' I niver missed it till I are home. d it till I got home.

I had just got off the dishes from the table, an' was clearin' up from my bit of tay, an' Miss Bashford, who had come in from her room, was talkin' wid me, whin ther was a rap at the dure, an' whin I said "Come in," who should march into the room but George, as bowld as brass, wid my cross. "You dropped this in the office," he saz, "an' as I knew where ye lived I thought I'd bring it to ye, an'—" wid that he stared like a stuck pig at Miss Bashford, an', ye may belave me, whin I looked at her she was as white as the wall. "Cherry!" sez he. "Mr. Gaskell," sez she. An' they begun to talk, an' I a-clatterin' the dishes an' a-droppin' the knives so as not to be knowin' to their discovers. discoorse. But I gethered enough to know that it's lovers they'd been, but she hed drapt him bekase he was rich an' she was poor; an' its drapt he wouldn't be,

After that George 'ud kape comin' roun' to my room, on some raison or other, three nights in the wake, an' it distrest Miss Cherry as much as it placed her. "For," sex she to me, "Mrs. McAvoy, his father is wantin' him to marry rich an' ay we wor to be married he would be ruined entirely." But I only laughed at that to myself. Sure it's the way with young girls, an' ispishully whin ther ladies bred as Miss Bashford was.

An' so it kept goin' on until wan even-', when ther' kem a rap at the dure at the time I was expectin' tu see George, an' I sez, "Come in!" an' Miss Cherry's eyes brightened, an' who should walk in but the owld gintleman, Mr. Gaskell, himself. Ow! wow! sez I to myself. His syes snapped, but he was as polite as a dancin' master. "Miss Bashford," sez he, "I presume," payin' no attention to me, the mistress of the mansion, which wasn't high bradin'; but he spoke as soft as a priest. She couldn't say a word for the life of her, poor girl; but she bowed.
"I have heard of George's visits here," he said, "and I have called to have a raisonsaid, "and I have called to have a raison-able talk with you. May I ask your given name?" sez he. "Cherry, sir." "Ah! yes, Charity, I suppose," givin' a kind o' shtart. "No, sir," she said. "I was christened Cherry, the same as my mother." You should av seen how he looked at her. "The same as your looked at her. "The same as your leather?" he sez. "Fwat—fwat was your mother's maiden name?" sez he. "Wellin'ton," sez she. "Good heavens!" he sez, jus' so. "An' what do you do for a sez, jus' so. "An' what do you do for a livin'?" "I sew on the machine, sir," said, as proud as if she'd said, "I cut coopends off my bonds." "An' you are Cherry Wellin'ton's daughter?" he sez, 'workin' for your livin' in a tiniment house up four pairs o' stairs. What changes in life!" We both began to stare at him, an' in walks Master George, an' he stared at him, too. "Ah!" sez the owld man, an' then we all was as still as

At last the owld man spoke. "What's yer intintions, young man," sez he, "toords this young glutlewoman?"

The very heart lept inside o' me whin he said that, for ladies are ladies, an' common as blackberries, but gintlewoman is a compliment.

without it." "An' what do you say, Miss-Miss Cherry?"

"Oh, sir!" sez she, an' she gript his hand, "I won't stand betune father an' son, but"—an' thin she fell to cryin' an' so did I.

"It strikes me," said the owld man, "It strikes me," said the owld man,
"that you'd better wait to talk about marryin' widout me consint when you've axed an' been refused," sez he, jus' so.

"I do ax ye, sir," sez George, but he spoke kind o' dazed.

"Ax Miss Cherry," sez the owld man,
"an' av she sez yes, so will I. Yer borryin' trouble, young man, which ye can do alsy at anny time widout interest."

Thin there wus a time. I didn't l'arn the rights of it thin, but I did after. The owld man had been dead in love wid Cherry's mother whin she was a gerril an' she cast him off an' mar-ried Cyrus Bashford, who was no good an' he spint her money an' kilt himself wid the drink. Bit by bit they wint down, until his widdy died an' left Cherry to take care of herself, an' well she did it. How they two young ones got acquainted I niver got the rights of—sure I couldn't be pokin' an' prayin'. Annyhow they got married an' I was at the weddin', among all the rich folks, in a new gown, though I stud in the back, as bekem me whin among the quality.

Well the week after the weddin' an' they off to spind ther time abroad, I wint into the buildin' here wid my basket, and what should I see but this beautiful stand heaped wid apples an' paynuts and can-dies; and my heart fell, for I said, "There's an ind o' my business here." The janitor sez to me, sez he: "Yer for-bidden to go inter the room there wid yer basket," sez he. "I am?" sez I. "Who sez so?" "Mr. Gaskell," sez he. "This stand is yours, an' all that's in it," sez he, "an' yer to keep on yer own premises."

An' with that owld Mr. Gaskell kem out an' spoke up: "Yis, Mrs. McAvoy, an' don't be daymoralizin' my clarks," sez he. "God bless you, sir," sez I, "an' may the heavens be yer best feather bed!" an' I've been here ever since, sir, an' that's the whole story. Bad scran to yer, ye little rascal of a newsb'y, are ye striv-in' to stale the paynuta? Git out.— Thomas Dunn English in New York Mercury.

An Apology for Armies. The objectors to the existence of armies base their main argument on the supposition that soldiers are the embodiment of the principle of force, and imagine that if they were got rid of a reign of peace would arene. Their syllogism is: War would ensue. Their syllogism is: War is an evil; war is waged by soldiers; therefore, if soldiers were abolished an evil thing would go with them. But they have first to prove that soldiers alone can make war. On the contrary, the most terrible and destructive invasions have been those not conducted by regular

The hordes of Zenghis Khan, the barbarians who overran the decaying Roman empire, grown luxurious and unwarlike; the tribes of Central Asia, which so long made civilization impossible, were not regular armies, and if it be said that we should let such people as the Kafirs, the Zulus, the Sikhs, the Mahrattas or the Burmese go their own way in peace, the answer is that it is not generals, but meranswer is that it is not generals, but mer-chants, who first interfere with them, and the aggressive spirit which the peace party has to put down is not that of soldiers, but of bagmen. It is somewhat inconsistent to talk of peaceful triumphs of commerce, seeing that every step made by commerce is invariably either preceded or followed by the use of arms. The freedom of the ocean was gained by fightfreedom of the ocean was gained by fighting, and the commerce of the British em pire places its throne upon English bayd-nets. Armies are not the cause of war, but the regulation of it, and reduction to its mildest terms.—Contemporary Re-

Garfield Campaign Relies

In the Garfield home at Mentor, O., are bound copies of the principal dailies throughout the United States for the year of the Garfield campaign, and finely bound scrapbooks containing extracts from papers, great and small, of which I counted sixty-four; scores and scores of substantially bound books labeled "Letters received," and scores more labeled "Letters sent;" files of campaign cartoons; immense collections of photo-graphs illustrating every event in the ca-reer of Garfield, and a collection of thirty or more canes with heavy gold heads and elaborate carving. One cane-too big to be useful—is a mass of inscriptions on the subject of temperance. Another is a withered sugar cane, bound together at the joints with massive bands of gold, and supplied with a handsome gold tassel at the head.—Cor. Chicago Inter Ocean.

The Pimas in Arizona have a curious custom, the reason of which we know not, but it is probably an exercise of their peculiar superstitions. Every windy day may be seen as many as a dozen of the noble red men on Tempe butte, and down on the gale come the notes of a plaintive, rhythmic song, monotonous and weird. Chicago News.
